

'After two sessions she was calmer and feeding well'

Is your baby a bundle of joy? Or are they crying a lot, wriggling with discomfort, fussy to feed?

An unhappy baby, Kate was nine weeks old when her parents brought her to Fiona McDevitt's clinic. They were concerned about her agitation when feeding, disrupted sleep and long bouts of crying. All seemed worse after her recent vaccinations.

Kate's dad had heard from colleagues at work that the light touch of craniosacral therapy (CST) had helped their distressed babies in similar situations.

Fiona says: "Our session began with the parents relating Kate's birth history, the last stage of labour was fast, just 45 minutes. Usually there are pauses as the baby passes through the birth canal allowing the baby to adjust to the experience. If delivery is fast, baby may be left feeling uncomfortable and out of sorts.

"While assessing Kate, I reassured her parents that babies often experience some temporary discomfort after vaccina-and by giving calming cues to Kate they could help her relax.

"Talking or singing with a soothing, gentle voice, breathing slowly, rocking, dropping their shoulders are all cues of safety and relaxation. At times, these cues can be overridden by baby's internal cues of pain or discomfort."

She continues: "So, with the gentle touch of CST, I helped Kate release the tension in her body and relax. After two sessions she was calmer and feeding well.

"Her parents tried a treatment too. Easing the tension in their bodies enabled them to better enjoy their wonderful bundle of joy."
